We'll highlight printing color separations, .Adding heat to an all-electric campus shuttle bus will help convert the bus, pictured below, into an electric hybrid vehicle. Michael Levin The weeks leading up to the 2016 Milpitas City Council vote on a $6.3 million plan to build a fleet of all-electric shuttle buses were hectic for Mayor Jim Hart, who's overseeing the district's 100-route bus service. And the city's goal of converting all of those buses to electric seemed to come with a lot of uncertainty, since it was the first time a public agency had tried to do that in a major city in the U.S. But Hart, a public works director for more than 25 years, is confident those buses will run without using a gas engine. "A lot of people are afraid of electric buses," Hart said. "I'm not afraid of electric buses. I'm confident that with time, we'll be successful and we'll prove it." The buses have been a popular and reliable part of the shuttle service. For decades, drivers have hopped on the board and started operating the buses. Hart said he hopes to keep that tradition alive. But he said he hopes to keep the bus drivers — his own employees — on board. Hart said the buses began making the commute around 30 years ago, and he had considered several alternative fuels, like compressed natural gas or diesel fuel, as well as an all-electric option. The gas prices were low, but in recent years, the price of gas has risen significantly — and that makes the electric option more cost-effective, he said. Hart said all of the buses have proprietary engines and that he won
