Although MiGA and FC should give any gamer a well-rounded gaming experience, it's the software that has grabbed the attention of the gaming community. The very term MiGA is a mouthful, but it suits the developers' style perfectly. MiGA tries to do everything, but fails to do any of them well. Graphics MiGA consists of pre-rendered 3D models, with a simple 3D character editor. These models look straight out of a game you'd play on your DS or GBA. The models are impressive, but the colours and textures could be much more vibrant. There's no colour palette, so you'll have to pick what to do with the thousands of available colours. By default, MiGA will give you a blueish colour, which is adequate for most games. The majority of the games seem to use a cartoon-like colour palette, which doesn't really look well on a TV screen. There's no transparency option, so images on top of other images will show through. There's no transparency colour, so you'll have to work that out yourself. Animations are well rendered, but the lack of depth will get boring, fast. There's no more detail than a spinning eyeball as far as depth is concerned, and if you go outside of MiGA, then you'll see everything in full 3D. Sound MiGA has no in-game sound. There's no support for any sound formats. All the sound is downloaded from the MiGA website, which isn't the most satisfactory way. If you plan on using MiGA on a decent TV set, then you'll have to listen to the sounds on your PC. The background music is repetitive, the sound effects are very generic and the voice overs are annoying. Interface MiGA's interface is almost the polar opposite of what makes the MiGA games so good. MiGA is divided up into a very
