The weight class is generally in the approximate range of 150 lbs (68 kg) to 170 lbs (77 kg).

At a minimum, a boxer would weigh no more than five pounds (2.3 kg) less than the higher limit of the weight class. For instance, a light heavyweight would generally be no more than five pounds (2.3 kg) less than the minimum limit of the middleweight class, 190 lbs (86 kg). The middleweight class as a rule of thumb is for those boxers between and. History The middleweight class is one of the oldest weight classes in boxing. The prize fighting of the 19th century in the United States was contested in six weight classes, including the middleweight division. Originally, the weight class was there to make fights more exciting in the world of prizefighting, at the time, among the most popular sporting events. Middleweights fought at a time before two weight classes were established to reduce the risk of the heavyweight boxers being overpowered by a more agile lightweight or middleweight competitor. A middleweight could stand more easily
