The best option is to have a drawing in AutoCAD and then copy and paste it into other applications. I know this may not be an option for those who use different platforms, but it is easy and saves having to redraw the same thing in other applications. Since the start of Autodesk DWG 2000, CAD applications (AutoCAD, AutoCAD LT, DWG, DXF and Autocad Architect) can access, via external DLL's, the embedded and native AutoLISP programming language. This support was added to AutoCAD LT for Windows 2000 and AutoCAD for Windows XP, and subsequently added to AutoCAD for Windows Vista and Windows 7, AutoCAD LT for Windows

2000, and AutoCAD LT for Windows XP SP2. AutoCAD LT for Windows XP SP3 added native C++, and the C++ AutoLISP, to the program's user interface. These capabilities are available for users with an active license of AutoCAD LT for Windows XP SP3, or a valid Premier or Architect developer license. AutoCAD LT 2010 introduced native C++ scripting, and the native C++ AutoLISP for Autodesk DWG 2008, also referred to as ADLIPS. AutoLISP allows users to integrate applications into the same application environment. The third-party product AutoCAD Architecture adds a scripting language called "custom script", allowing the user to add AutoLISP scripts to the AutoCAD Architecture user interface. The following table lists the AutoCAD 2010 functionality for both AutoCAD and AutoCAD LT
