Dietary intake of the German population in relation to public health guidelines. To evaluate the degree to which the German population follows the public health recommendations of the US-American association of food sciences and public health (FAO/WHO).

Data were obtained from the German National Nutrition Survey (NVS). Dietary intakes were estimated by 24-h-weighed food record from a representative sample of 1,202 adults and 431 children (10-12 years), 1,546 adolescents (12-17 years), and 905 pregnant women. In comparison with the recommendations of the FAO/WHO, the populations of adults, adolescents, and pregnant women who consumed more than ten, seven, and ten percent of the FAO/WHO's recommendations for physical activity, vegetable and fruit consumption, and intake of starch, respectively, had the best nutritional status. While overall adherence to the recommendations on starch intake was low (11%), adherence to the recommendations on vegetable and fruit consumption was relatively good (38% for both). Although no sex difference was found in the overall adherence, a significant sex difference was found for the adherence to the recommendations on vegetable and fruit consumption. Compared with the recommendations for physical activity, the German populations had a lower degree of adherence to the recommendations on vegetable and fruit intake. In general, the adherence to the recommendations for vegetable and fruit consumption was higher in the adolescents than in adults. In comparison with the recommendations for physical activity, those for vegetable and fruit consumption are more commonly adhered to. This may have consequences for public health in Germany. Rubber-banding of inertial cavitation in plasmas. We show that stable cavitation can be created by the spontaneous oscillation of a cavitation bubble embedded in a liquid in a high-frequency (30-100 kHz) fluid harmonic trap. The cavitation bubble is created by a converging shock wave that passes through the trap. The cavitation bubble oscillates in the trap from one compression to the next, until the shock wave stops and a shock-tube like shock collapse occurs. We show that a particle or a bubble that is initially embedded in the high-frequency oscillating fluid is accelerated due to the hydrodynamic forces produced by the cavitation bubble. The particle's acceleration is found to be proportional to the square root of the trap frequency, which
