Hydrogen sulfide, a major component of volatile sulfur compounds (VSC), is generated from sulfate reduction. However, it has not been conclusively demonstrated that the VSC in human saliva originate from bacterial metabolic activities. In order to evaluate the influence of microbial processes on the VSC released from dental plaque (dental plaque-derived VSC, DPdVSC), a 6-day-long in vivo study was conducted on four healthy volunteers. Saliva and saliva/plaque mixture was collected to determine the concentrations of sulfur compounds before, during and after the dental procedures. The VSC released in the saliva were characterized and quantified using gas chromatography. After a baseline collection, participants received dental prophylaxis and scaling. They were then asked to refrain from eating and drinking for the next 6 days. After this time period, saliva was collected for 6 h in the morning and 3 h in the afternoon. Each period was preceded by 8 h of fasting and followed by 8 h of food ingestion. This sequence of collection was repeated daily. Total sulfide and hydrogen sulf
