This page will explain how to install the Windows driver for a Galaxy H558 tablet device from Samsung. You will need to download a driver for your specific computer OS. In addition, the device might be sold in a multibillion-dollar global TV ad campaign (with sales of more than $20 billion in 2013). Or maybe not at all -- it's a Samsung ad, after all. Actually, though, the tablet comes with a third-party Samsung application, the Octovideo application, which allows you to watch TV and movies on the tablet device. Note that Octovideo is NOT the official Samsung application, so your TV and movie output will not match Samsung's official TV apps. The Octovideo application can be found in the Google Play Store. Model Description A new Samsung Galaxy Tab H558 7.0" is currently selling for $349.00 in the United States. The gadget features a stylus that should make texting on the tablet easier than on the iPad. The model in the video below has a 3G connectivity. The newer H558 7.0" has Wi-Fi and Bluetooth. It's also 10.2 mm thin, has a 1.2 GHz dual core processor, a pixel density of 287 ppi, and a 3000 mAh battery. The gadget weighs 6.4 oz (approximately 218g). You'll need to download the drivers for your PC so you can install them in your device. 1. Upcoming Xbox One Changes for Trading Cards

The Xbox One dashboard has seen many changes with each new release, and the upcoming Xbox One changes that are currently being discussed include one final shift that would see users get access to their digital trading cards. Looking for an arcade-like experience with your games? Perhaps some card collecting too? It's worth remembering, but as announced on the Xbox Wire blog, Xbox One users may soon get to buy and sell digital trading cards through the Xbox One.

Back in 2013, Microsoft explained the online trading card marketplace as a way for users to trade, sell, or trade for rewards and that it was "coming in the future." Now, while there isn't a specific date as to when that will be, it sounds like those features may be coming sooner than anticipated. While no specific information was shared, a brief article from Digital Trends goes into how Microsoft won't use public apps like the

Facebook Marketplace or Google Play for their card marketplace, instead opting to go private. With that, their Marketplace will be private, with users having access to the best prices when selling or buying cards. It sounds rather interesting that Microsoft wants users to be able to buy and sell digital cards. There are obvious reasons why they would want to do this for their Marketplace. Cards, as you know, are digital versions of collectible items that most trading card games use. From Munchkin to Star Wars: The Clone Wars, digital trading cards are a simple and fun way to enjoy your favorite games. With the upcoming year of Xbox Live Gold and Xbox Game Pass, it stands to reason that Microsoft may want to tap into the card market as it's a perfect addition. While that has been the rumor for quite a while, this is the first time it has seemed more likely to come into fruition. Maybe now, cards will be a unique addition to the more traditional ways of earning those rewards or even leveling up for gamers looking for something different. Of course
