I'm interested in the answers to the following two questions What are the default time intervals for a javascript variable. Is there a way to programmatically find out the default time interval for a variable? A: They're determined by how the variable is declared. var foo = 5; // Allocated to globals var foo = 5; // Allocated to function scopes (function(){ var foo = 5; }()); // Declared within the braces of an immediately invoked function expression var foo; (function(){ var foo = 5; }()); // Declared within a function expression var foo; (function(){ var foo = 5; }()); A: A common way to get the default type of an object is (new Object).constructor; // "Object" So if you declare your variable var myVar = "something"; ... you'll get the "default" object: (new myVar).constructor // "Object" A: For the default time intervals, the execution context in which the variable is defined dictates what the value of the variable is. The unhelpful phrasing "the default time intervals" is the reason why. function a() { var a = 5; console.log(a); } var a = 5; console.log(a); a(); Try it out in the console. The default time interval for a declared without an initialization is undefined, and for a declared in an expression (i.e. in the body of a function) is the body of the function. The default time interval for a declared in a declaration is the left-hand side of the equals sign. Q: How to show text over image in android I am trying to overlay an image with text.
