- Twitter - Youtube - Facebook - Tumblr - Blog - Google+ - Google+ The response of human monocytes and lymphocytes to HIV-1 infection in vivo and in vitro. Previous in vitro studies demonstrated that HIV-1 produced by infected monocytes can infect normal lymphocytes. The aim of this study was to explore the susceptibility of peripheral blood lymphocytes (PBL) and monocytes to HIV-1 infection and the consequences of this interaction in a person with immunodeficiency. Two monoclonal antibodies (anti-CD4 and anti-HIV) were used to define the surface phenotype of PBL and monocytes in the peripheral blood of an HIV-infected patient. HIV-1 production by monocytes was assessed in the patient's blood and in conditioned media obtained from cultures of monocytes and PBL. Infected and uninfected control cells were used to investigate the effect of virus on cell viability and on the phenotype and function of the infected lymphocytes. We found that the majority of lymphocytes in the patient's blood were CD4+ and contained high levels of cell-associated HIV RNA. Similar levels of virus were detected in the patient's monocytes. The infected lymphocytes and monocytes were susceptible to infection in vitro and to the cytopathic effects of HIV. The infected cells produced low but detectable levels of HIV-1. Phenotypic analysis of the infected lymphocytes showed that the majority of the infected cells were CD8+ T cells. HIV-1 infection of lymphocytes in vivo results in cell-associated virus and detectable levels of HIV-1 production that is independent of monocyte infection. A subpopulation of infected lymphocytes is phenotypically similar to effector memory T cells (CD45RO+).Do you want to be a part of a community of progressive minded people who are passionate about our planet, the rights of indigenous people and a bff6bb2d33
