The original aim of this laboratory was to study the role of splanchnic vascular beds on the regulation of Na and water excretion in the sheep. Over the past 4 years the objectives of the project have centered on the control of electrogenic Na absorption in the intestine. These studies have shown that amino acid composition of the luminal perfusion medium affects both the direction and magnitude of intestinal Na absorption. Substitution of a non-metabolizable amino acid, such as L-lysine, for arginine reduces the amount of absorptive Na entry to a level comparable to that observed during absorption of the nonabsorbable amino acid
