The technology is used to move the athletes on screen, while allowing for the camera to track the movements of the ball more accurately. [source - This in-depth video features Tom Donsane talking about the previous development he has achieved for FIFA 20 and how this development works: FIFA 20 took the idea of adaptive AI and further developed it by making the AI decisions based on the player data collected from the game, rather than on their past performance. FIFA 10 introduced a new method that was at the time new and could potentially confuse the player. Instead of the AI making decisions based on its own performance, the AI was making decisions based on a player's player trait, which changed the AI behavior to a particular trait. This worked very well, as the AI could make intelligent decisions. However, as the player evolves, the AI can no longer learn a player's traits. As the player evolved, the AI would not understand that they behave in a certain way and would therefore make bad decisions. FIFA 13 introduced a system that was known as 'Mixed Play and Casual AI', which was a hybrid between the two. This system tries to adapt to the player's attributes by letting the player influence the AI's decisions. As the player improves, the AI evolves, making it a better approach to create a more realistic and intelligent opponent. The same concept was kept in FIFA 14 as the 'Adaptive AI'. The player still influenced the AI's decisions but their influence changed from 'automatically affective' to 'manual affective'. This means that the player can not only change their attributes and learn new characteristics but also create the AI's behavior. However, what the AI learned over the years from the player's attributes also improved. FIFA 15 introduced 'Skin Intelligence'. Skin Intelligence meant that the player's attributes significantly influenced the artificial intelligence. This means that the player no longer had to mimic a certain set of attributes; the player
