spatial position of extra-ocular motion. Much previous research has shown that a variety of stimuli, such as the spatial position of lines and dots, can bias the perception of the orientation of moving lines.
In addition, a psychological construct, temporal binding theory, has explained a large body of empirical work suggesting that temporal coherence influences the orientation of motion. If temporal binding is a cognitive mechanism for enhancing the coherence of motion, motion in one temporal stream should bias the perception of motion in a second temporal stream. We tested this hypothesis in three experiments. In all experiments, the perception of motion was measured in subjects when the temporal binding of two streams was varied by presenting random-dot stimuli in two saccadic eye movements that were temporally separated by an exposure interval.
In experiment 1, the spatial position of the dots was varied in depth (1-10 degrees) or in azimuth, and in experiment 2, the dots were presented in only one of the saccades in a
