Death certificate data can be a valuable resource for medical/public health practice. In the case of a close evaluation of a death certificate, certain interesting medical and/or public health issues can be determined. We aimed to determine the proximal causes of death (PCOD) in death certificates that had received an autopsy and to compare the PCs determined from autopsy and from death certificates. Records of 351 autopsies that were performed for suspicion of murder in the Province of Thessaloniki during the years 2013-2016 were collected. The PCs from the death certificates were compared with those from the autopsy reports. In the 351 autopsies, there were 233 males and 118 females (M/F ratio: 2.3). The mean age at time of death was 39.57 years (SD = 29.31). The main causes of death were brain diseases (32.9%), cardiovascular diseases (28.1%), and neoplasms (17.6%). In the autopsy reports, the most frequent PCs were neoplasm (33.4%), cardiovascular disease (29.8%), and infection (25.7%). In the death certificates, the most frequent PCs were neoplasm (24.8%), cardiovascular disease (20.2%), and infection (20.2%). However, 11 of the neoplasm deaths were diagnosed as death from sepsis. There was an insignificant difference between autopsy and death certificate PCODs in the total sample ( $p > 0.05$ ) and in the group of males ( $p > 0.05$ ), but there was a significant difference in the group of females ( $p$  Following an official request to open the data to a wider audience, and after giving it more attention to make sure it
