The carriers, also referred to as service providers, responsible for providing and maintaining the telecommunications services generally use a variety of network components, including a mobile switching center (MSC) to provide the telecommunication services to subscribers. For Internet services, the MSC is used to route the communications to and from the Internet. In order for the MSC to provide such Internet services, the MSC must be adequately provisioned with routers, or Internet routers. Internet routers are typically constructed in the form of a box having a variety
