What's new:

By "no other weapons can it be [turned] but with the sword," wrote one nineteenth-century French socialist. Those words, by the way, are from Karl Marx, as I learned in one of my least favorite classes in my undergraduate days. The quote, of course, was made by a philosopher who once dreamed of a "glorious popular revolution" against the rulers of humanity, but who admired the aristocracies of his day, decried movements that sought to overthrow those leaders, and who believed—though the nature of his ultimate life's work, and the extent to which it was based on a fundamental lie, obviously render that belief less than completely pure—that when all the revolutionaries have been committed to "the political cemetery," that there will be "dawn at last." I've searched the French language on that topic, but have yet to come across that particular quote. That's just as well, because I'm pretty sure it is a quote from Julius Marx. The quote is from a son, rather than the philosopher's father, but I think I understand the underlying message. The man who shared Karl Marx's philosophy, his sense of historical inevitability, was a French economist named Pierre Guillaume Chevet de Murville (1764-1835), who coined the term "socialist" in the form "socialist movement." I'm quite certain that Marx would not have approved of his father's "sordid" pretense of socialism: Chevet maintained that a nation's government would be a dictatorship of the proletariat, heading a communist state for the benefit of that class and for the nation. That is, I believe, why his epitaph in the cemetery is a quote from another Karl Marx, the one he authored in the 1840's in Le Capital, where the holy trinity of exploitation by land, wage labor, and capital is found. That Karl Marx was just as much a "politician of the people" as Bill Franklin, who would be elected state treasurer in DeKalb County in November 2002. And, his wife, Jenny was the writer. His friend from London, Engels, was a "L.A. philanderer" who married Jenny and raised her together with their children. The Marxes were hardly revolutionaries; better to say they were "theor
