Elevated rates of smoking are observed in psychiatric patients. Some authors suggested that those smokers who develop a psychiatric disorder, are emotionally preoccupied with the pleasant or satisfying affective characteristics of the drug. Another kind of smoker, more prone to develop a psychiatric disorder is smoking to avoid unpleasant emotional states. This is known as the "smoking-as-an-antidepressant" hypothesis. Still, there is no convincing evidence that current smokers who intend to quit smoking are motivated by the moodelevating properties of the drug. A third group, those smokers who develop a disorder are more cognitively preoccupied with the cognitive aspects of smoking. This emotional and cognitive dual-process hypothesis helps to explain why those who experience most of the depressogenic or anxiety producing effects of smoking usually do not develop a psychiatric disorder (Hursh et al., 2002). The work of Riech et al. (2012) supports this suggestion. It suggests that a functional polymorphism in the DRD2 gene that encodes dopamine D2 receptor, has an impact on smoking behavior. This polymorphism is related to the personality dimension extraversion (Schmidt et al., 2002). People with high extraversion scores are more extraverted and less neurotic. On the other hand, the DRD2 gene association seems to be less important for smokers with low extraversion scores d0c515b9f4

What's up with the weather? Ozone levels in the sky have been rising at an unprecedented rate. The World Meteorological Organization revealed last week that the August average ozone level was almost 500 nanograms per cubic meter, a whopping 29% higher than the previous August average. On Saturday, the atmospheric unit reached a new high of more than 540 nanograms per cubic meter - the highest recorded anywhere since it began measuring levels in 1959. Environmental
