A radionuclide study of the mediastinal and abdominal lymph nodes in patients with lung cancer. Radioactive scans of the mediastinum and abdomen were performed in 88 patients with lung cancer (44 lung cancers and 44 benign diseases) to compare the differences in node size and distribution between the two groups.

Although these methods have been used in diagnosis of lymph node metastasis in lung cancer, their results have been controversial. We attempted to evaluate the diagnostic sensitivity, specificity, and accuracy of these scans. The scan showed a diffuse pattern in 47% of lung cancers and in 83% of benign diseases, and a focal pattern in 43% of lung cancers and in 17% of benign diseases. We conclude that these methods cannot be used alone as a diagnostic tool for mediastinal or abdominal lymph node metastasis, because these differences in patterns are only shown in metastatic nodes.
