Data on the morphologic and functional features of skeletal muscle in Klinefelter's syndrome are scanty. Its contribution to the severe exercise-induced myalgias in this syndrome remains unresolved. Morphologic studies on sectioned muscle biopsies and electron microscopy revealed mild muscle fibers without histologic evidence of inflammatory reaction or fat storage. In situ hybridization showed no evidence of widespread myotonic dystrophy, and no evidence of denervation, inflammation or myofibrillar degeneration was observed on semithin sections. Electron microscopy of mitochondria from several skeletal muscles in one patient revealed abnormalities in their structure, but these changes were not recognized as pathogenic. What's new in Wormhole:

(1914) Heavy fog in the morning meant the opening of the Somme battles was slow for many, dull for some. But with the line stabilising across France, the troops sensed first blood and were hoping for the spectacular large-scale breakthrough that did not occur. The foreleg of Lieutenant General von Kluck's Fourth (German) Army reached the line and the strong German counter-attack forced the London Territorials at the 'Dump' to fall back to the new Hindenburg Line and out of the line of fire. Foggy conditions made the Somme battle more of a test of endurance than a precise battle, causing more casualties. Across the Atlantic the first battle of America, the First Battle of Belleau Wood, had ended successfully. Selection from the British Official History After Rheims the Germans drove hard on the British right. General Byng's difficult defence was improved by the taking of Poulainville by the 58th Infantry Brigade and the capture of La Charité by the 17th (London) Division. At the same time the 27th and 55th Infantry Brigades of Montgomery-Massingberd's III Corps, relieved the French the early evening of 23 June, while a proportion of his Brigade went into La Charité and picked up Flers. It was a case of in one place and out the other as the Germans "put the boot in". On the Right the capture of Flers, which had been the Hindenburg defensive position when the Germans marched to the Somme, enabled the German Fourth Army to pinch southwards and to threaten the British left flank. It was a potentially serious gap and General Byng saw the danger and raised the III Corps headquarters to assist the 51st Division which was holding an outpost line in front of Flers. The capture of Flers also brought the II Anzac Corps up to the full Somme front from Bapaume, which had been given priority by the French High Command to prepare for the offensive for the first time in nearly a month. The severe difficulty experienced on each attack was the bad weather which made it almost impossible for the artillery and the anti-aircraft to get forward quickly enough to support the infantry attack. The prolonged artillery bombardment was kept up in the early hours to work on the wire which enabled the infantry to move out in the original Bapaume order but the British machine guns had been brought forward early enough to get the gun flashes to light up the
