When we live within our story lines, we may be told "this is what the world is like" and are not taught about the world as it truly is. Life Within Our Story Lines Our story lines may also include events that are more emotional or traumatic in nature. Many people have eventful memories, sometimes in a very negative fashion, where they are surrounded by people laughing, while the person remembers feeling "everything in their body was frozen." Life is similar to an iceberg. The above-water portion of the iceberg is known as the conscious world. The below-water portion is known as the unconscious world. These unconscious actions, learned behaviors, or emotions that the person may not be aware of are known as "stories" that the person has created to explain a situation. Some stories that we can create about our life include, "My life is terrible", "I am going to fail", "I am not good enough", "I am not attractive". The list is endless, but the point is, all of these stories are impacting the way that you live your life. What impact do the stories you have created have on your life? Are they causing you stress? How will you choose to change it? Listen to your stories as carefully as you are listening to your conscious self. There will always be a part of you that is listening, and to truly make a change, you need to listen to the part that is creating your story lines. More spending by the Ontario government means a family of four of average means will need to pay $1,725 less in 2019 to afford child care services than they would have in 2017.
