Photoshop Elements is a program for home use that takes advantage of all the features that make Photoshop one of the industry's most popular image editing programs. Photoshop Elements lets you edit a number of different types of image files, including jpegs, jpegs with alpha transparency, tiffs, and EPS, with multiple transparent and non-transparent layers. You can even open slideshows and import photos from a digital camera. A word about file format Unlike photos on a traditional film camera, digital photos can be edited at any time. The question is, how do you save the image that you just created? Nearly all photo programs and photo-editing programs save in one of two ways: * In a file format that stores the image data in a fixed format. Each photo file stores specific data about the image in a specific format. * In a file format that stores the image data in such a way that you can freely manipulate the data inside the file. These formats are flexible and enable you to do almost anything with the image data inside the file, including changing the colors, formatting the images, changing the size, and so on. In either case, when you save, you save the information about the image, not the image data. On a digital camera, images are saved in the JPEG format. JPEG is a standard format in which you can't freely manipulate the image data, because the data is fixed in the format that the camera produces. However, you can convert the image to another format that you can freely manipulate. So if you save in JPEG format, you just use that information and don't go looking for the original image data. For more about the advantages and disadvantages of various file formats, check out the sidebar "Examining File Formats." Different file formats store different information in the file. JPEG files store only image data, and you can save information about the image in the file. You can save the image data in a format that you can freely manipulate at any time or you can save the image data in a file format that stores information about the image. As you can see, the file type itself doesn't determine whether you can manipulate the image data — it's the type of data that you save in the file that determines that. The file extension The filename extension — a.jpg file, for example — can be one of four types. The types, also referred to as Recycling has been a headache for the United States for a long time. That's why the country's biggest newspaper, The New York Times, decided to get rid of its 6,000 tons of newsprint with a nifty machine called "The Metroliner." But now, what the newspaper's done with its old ink and paper is creating ripples in the washing machine industry. According to the newspaper, The Metroliner eliminates the need to dry ink on paper. And when it comes to the waste water, it's a greener solution than a press. The Metroliner recycles both the paper and the chemicals used to make the ink. It takes old newspapers and pulps them, then uses a blender to re-form the pulp. Hence the idea behind the paperless Metroliner: How many newspapers do you think make up a ton of pulp, anyway? Enough to feed the Metroliner machine 16 times. Along with eliminating the need for ink-made paper, The Metroliner also uses less energy than a press. And the machine can remove up to 96 percent of the ink from old newspapers. At the end of the process, the Metroliner has created a handful of jobs, too. Last year, the newspaper teamed up with Finland-based Viipurin Kaikkialla paper mill, which supplies The Times with its recycled pulp. The papermill employs an average of 20 people, and since it's located in Finland, the U.S. imports most of its pulp to feed the machine. But in the wake of Donald Trump's less-than-welcoming immigration policy, The Times is now selling pulp to the Viipurin Kaikkialla mill, a Finnish paper maker that recently opened a recycling operation in America. "That's a good thing, but I just think they should also do something for America," the paper's CEO, Mark Thompson, said to CNN. Read more The Emergency Election Sale is now live!
