The Vagabond Starship is a solar car built in the United States by a young South African, but now based in Italy, for the long-distance Solar Challenge racing competition. The CarbonFLEX Solo car, which weighs over 600 kg, did not reach its intended finishing time and was no-contest winner in the solar challenge, held in August 2009. History The VSS won the Flinders Trophy in Australia, and in the 2009 long distance competition in the USA, finishing second. At its most successful, it did not finish in any competitions in Australia. Operational history The solar powered crew could access in the 2009 competition with range of the car, more than any other car in the race. The car could not refuel, so crew were towed to the end of the race after a number of solar charging opportunities. After a team member passed out close to the end, Bärbel Hönisch was dropped and was towed backwards after the no-contest final classification. Performance Driving speed Setting out from the South Australian capital, Adelaide, the VSS was required to do a lap of the 2,772 km course, which crosses 500 kilometres of deserts, tracks, cities and other typical Australian highways, in approximately 24 hours. The speed achieved by the VSS was measured at a figure of 6.34 km/h, which was recorded to be the fastest speed for a solar powered vehicle. Final position In the 2009 race that highlighted the competition, the VSS finished in the second position, and charged a total of 4,659 kilowatt hours (kWh) of electricity. Defeat by number While the VSS took second place to the Beardmore, the team drew the least number of cars due to the high number of rule infringements, amongst the 177 teams that started the 2009 race. 2010 Participants Australia The 2010 competition was held in Australia for the second time in the 11-year competition's history. For the 2010 competition, the ACES team, Desert Solar, returned as the sole Australian participant. The Eastern Districts Supercharger club returned after its official retirement in 2009 to "make a final try at a challenge". Southside Towns Southside Towns: an introduction to Chicago's communities of color is a 2010 book by Gary Holmes. Summary Southside Towns focuses on Chicago's black communities, discussing issues such as the majority-black community of Englewood, the integration of the city, and the fallout of the Great Migration to the city to find jobs. It also discusses instances of police brutality and corruption in Chicago's black communities. A topic Holmes has researched since 1998. Reception The book received generally positive reviews. Publishers Weekly reviewed it positively and stated "Holmes' (Slavery by Another Name: The Paradox of Liberation and 2015's Pulitzer Prize-nominated City on the Make: Chicago's Race for the Third Award) deep knowledge about the city's long and complicated history of racism is also clear. Holmes also adds some new historical insights to the mix." The Chicago-based Freedom Center praised the book and stated "The facts are abundant, the view penetrating and insightful and the presentation clear and concise." Chicago-based website My Chicago also gave the book generally positive reviews, stating "Southside Towns is the first book-length account of the impact of race on black life in Chicago since the late 20th century.... This book does a far better job than other books of capturing the experiences of those on the South Side as well as conversations about race and racism that have taken place outside of the black community."
