Albinism is a rare genetic condition caused by mutations in the tyrosinase gene (TYR), which inactivate the enzyme L-tyrosine-oxidase. Albinism affects the visual system, and visual function is less well understood in albinism than in normal individuals. To investigate this, we studied the visual ERGs and visual evoked potentials in eight albino patients. Compared to a control group of ten normal individuals of similar age and sex, the amplitude of the albinos' ERGs was significantly decreased in all components and in both eyes, and the mean latency of the albino amplitudes was increased in all waves. The largest differences were detected in the late waves P3 and N1. A difference in the latency of the N1 component appeared to differentiate between the normal individuals and the albinos in the right eye and the amplitudes in all components in the left eye. In the albinos, the latency of the N1 component in
