Itself an important property in the health service sector and small businesses, the criteria for the growth of Australia's internationally leading pharmaceutical industry are now being redefined. Science in Australia is drawing on a well-understood climate with significant long-term funding from the Federal government. In the research sector, comparable long-term funding is being provided by the Australian Research Council. The value of the Australian dollar to overseas sales remains crucial to success, but the rise of biotechnology and the creation of life science products is facilitating the ability of Australian companies to sell around the world. Australian universities and research institutions are also performing exceptionally well in international rankings. In 2005, the Academic Ranking of World Universities for 2010 ranked Australia as the world's top-ranked university in the subject of engineering. The engineering industry is the third largest employer in Australia, with some 959,000 employees. Security In March 2017, a shooting occurred at the Martin Place, Sydney, located next to the Australian Consulate-General, in the heart of Sydney's CBD. A 29-year-old Australian national man was shot in the head and neck by an Iranian-born Iranian national with a New Zealand passport after the man was escorted out of the consulate. The shooter was later arrested after the shot occurred. The man died later in hospital from his wounds.
