Gas-powered grills with electrical conversion systems are often used as a firebox in an outdoor stove by mounting the appliance to the top of the stove so that a top-sealing grill cover can enclose the burner. For example, see U.S. Pat. Nos. 6,250,817 and 4,882,906. In some grills of the instant type the gas burner is enclosed by a grill cover which passes over the burner through a central passage contained therein. Typically, the burner is adjustable so that the flame position can be varied to accommodate cooking of different items on the grill. This adjustability of flame position can however present difficulties in sealing the burner to the side walls of the gas outlet passage. Typically, an O-ring seal is located in the vertical wall of this passage. However, the gas pressure within the outlet passage can cause this seal to move with respect to the outlet passage when the burner is adjusted. This can result in excessive heat loss by the outlet passage to the ambient air. Another difficulty presented by conventional grills in this configuration is that, since the grill cover is located directly over the burner, the cover cannot adequately focus the heat of the burner so that it can be directed toward food and cooking utensils placed on the grill. U.S. Pat. No. 4,222,422 discloses a mounting arrangement for a gas grill wherein a cover is located atop a top portion of the stove, and gas burner and ignition system are enclosed by the cover. An inverting gas valve is provided in the cover to convert gas pressure present in the top of the stove to a high pressure at the bottom of the stove. Therefore, if a high pressure is available, a high pressure is present at the bottom of the stove. Unfortunately, the high pressure in the top of the stove is low energy inefficient, and may even result in complete shutoff of the gas burner at a low ambient temperature. U.S. Pat. No. 5,103,854 discloses a range cover which is mounted over a top mounting plate of the range cover is fixed to a neck of a jumbo sized toaster disposed within the range. This combination prevents heat from the burner from heating the cover, and also the cover does not necessarily provide the desired direct combustion heat from the burner toward a cooking utensil placed upon the grill."Is there a plan for a Bazook
