The telecommunication industry has seen a transformation in recent years with the advent of new broadband telecommunication technologies, such as, DSL, DECT, T1, ISDN, ADSL, etc. This transformation has been fueled by a surge in both consumer and business demand. Connection devices, such as, modems, routers, etc. and a large variety of telecommunication networks have been integrated to form a broadband network. The combination of these technologies is basically a simple and inexpensive solution for today's communication needs. As a result, the number of users connected to a network and the amount of information being communicated over the network are both increasing rapidly. In fact, both numbers have been increasing exponentially for the last several years. The trend of ever-increasing communication needs must be balanced with the finite amount of spectrum that is available for communications. Consequently, telecommunication service providers face a challenge to make their services available to as many users and to have efficient use of the finite available spectrum. Due to the variety of types of communication services available over the telecommunication network,
